Health is a human right and one of the elements of welfare that must be realized in accordance with the ideals of the Indonesian nation. Health is one of the basic human needs in addition to food and shelter. Efforts to maintain public health through health efforts by providing health services to the community. One of the health services for the community is hospital services, which are of high quality by prioritizing safety and quality of service with accreditation. The implementation of hospital accreditation is currently consistently implemented and there are no clear sanctions for hospitals that have not implemented it. The issues raised in this dissertation 1) Why is there a need for legal regulations on hospital accreditation? 2) How is the application of hospital accreditation certification law as a legal instrument of public health services? 3) What are the legal consequences for non-accredited hospitals ?

In the research, the author uses theoretical foundations including the theory of the State of Law, the theory of Public Service and the theory of Legal Certainty. Based on the problems studied, this type of research is a normative legal research method with research specifications used are analytical descriptive with primary, secondary and tertiary legal materials. Technical analysis uses qualitative data analysis techniques.

The results showed that the legal regulation of hospital accreditation for legal protection in health services for the community needs to be regulated in the form of laws in order to fulfill the elements of human rights, rights and obligations of citizens, division of state power and finance. The application of accreditation law is carried out only to avoid termination of cooperation with BPJS Kesehatan Institutions and the existence of different regulations in the implementation of hospital accreditation, especially regarding the duration of accreditation implementation. The legal consequences of hospitals that are not accredited to date there are no clear sanctions in the current legislation. Legal provisions of hospital accreditation, the achievement of quality hospitals will be more possible. Hospital accreditation is a way to improve the quality of public health services. Hospital accreditation must be done because it is a lawsuit against the increasing quality of hospital services.
